THE ROBERT HARPER HOUSE

By Charlotte Judd Fairbairn

Concerning Robert Harper

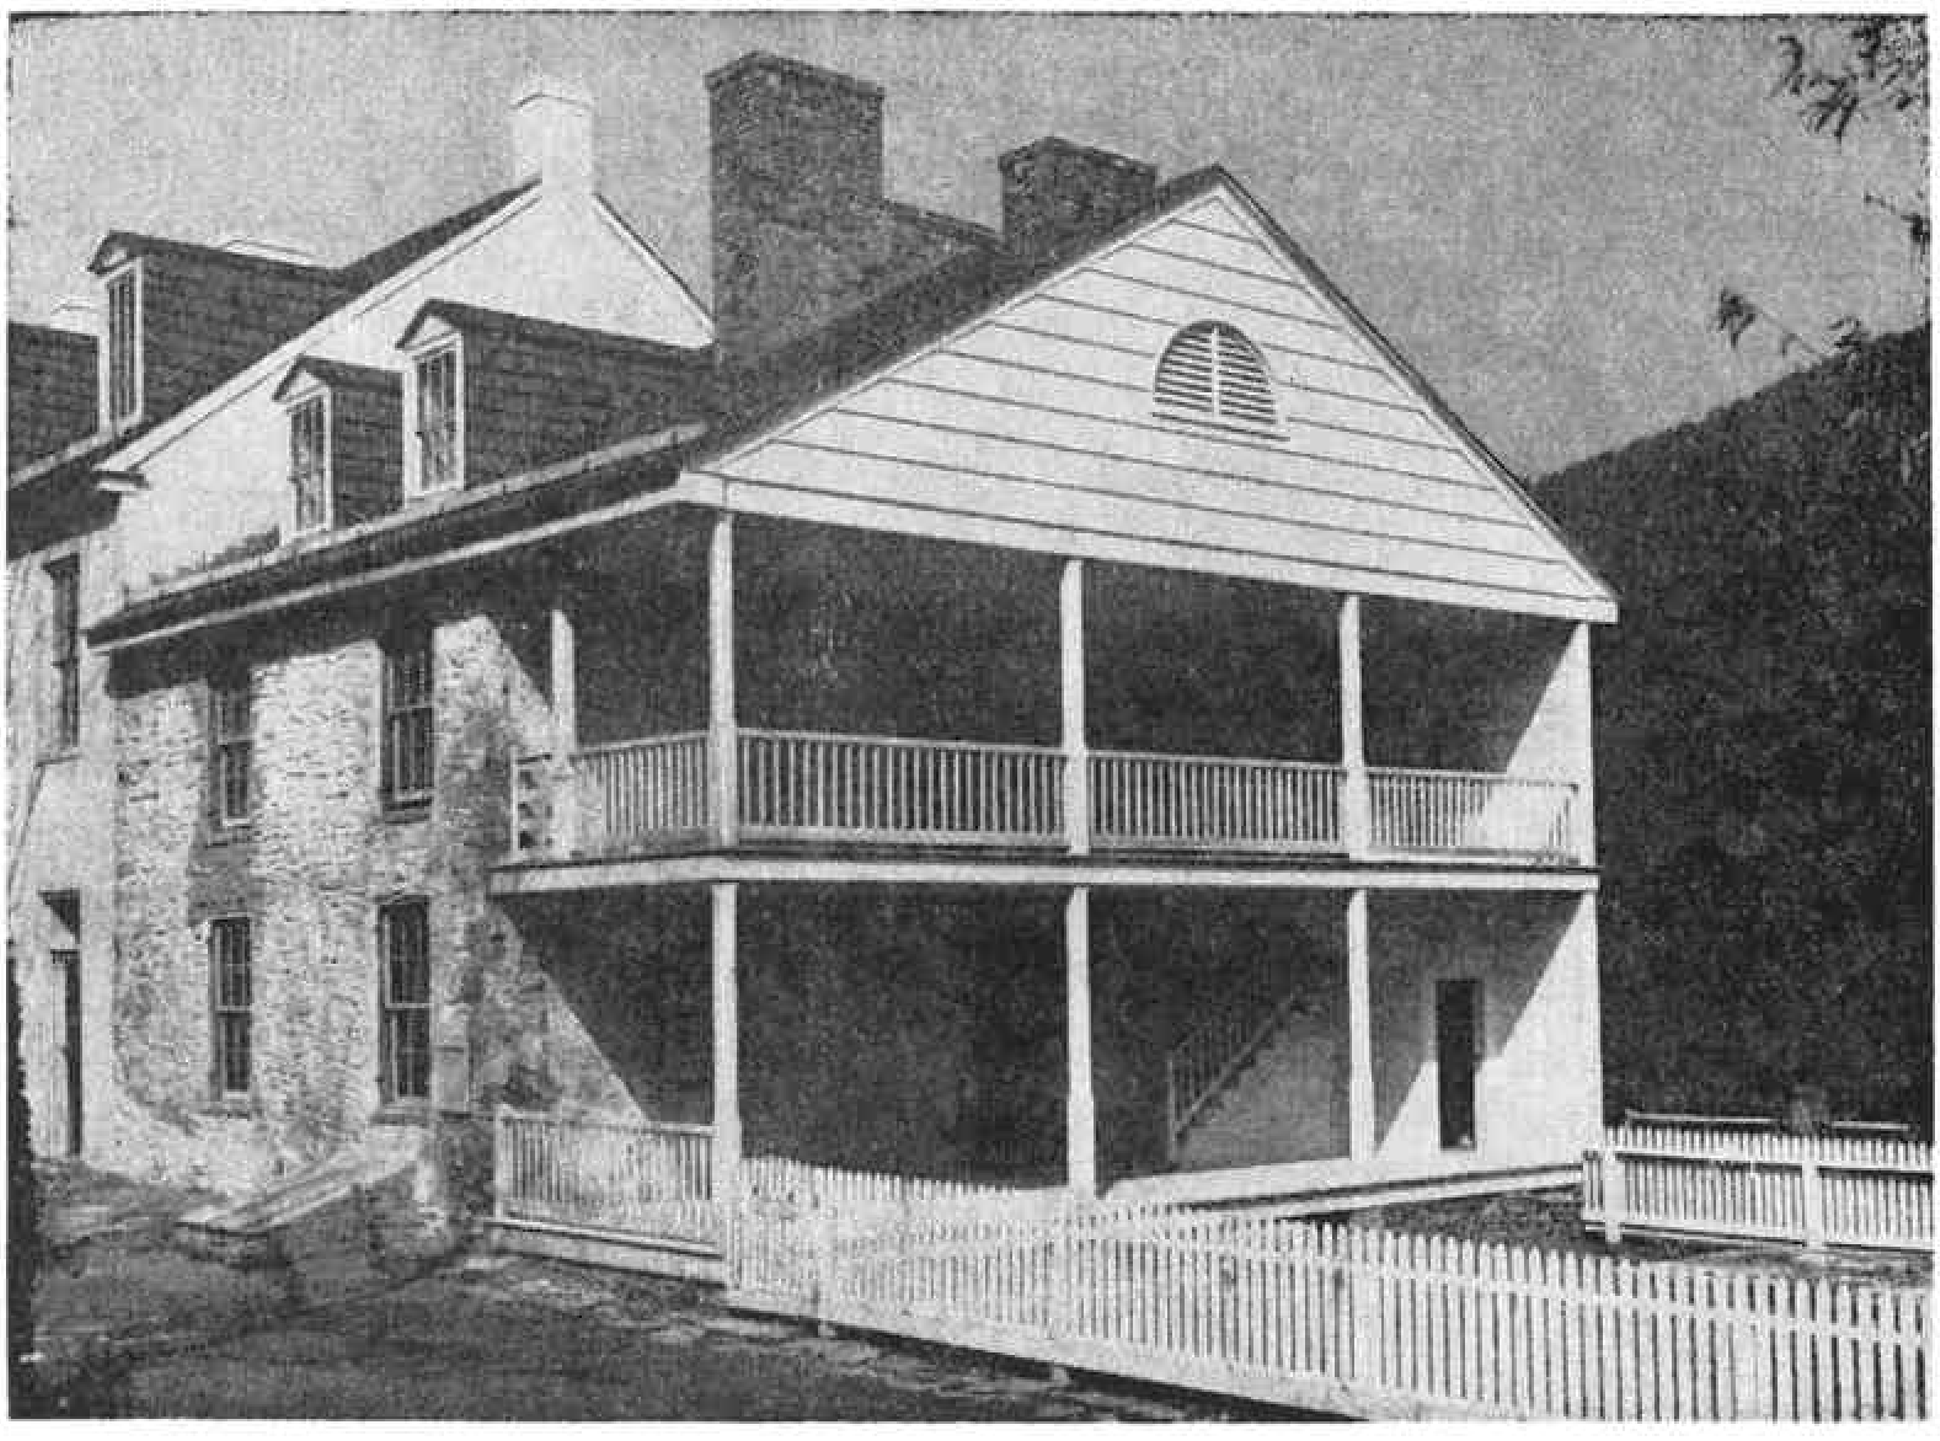

Much more extensive research is needed to complete the entire story of Robert Harper, founder of Harpers Ferry, and of his family in England and Philadelphia. Presently we have only a bare skeleton of fact, compiled from records now assembled at Harpers Ferry National Monument, and from Harper family traditions.

Traditionally "Robert Harper's father, John Harper, who settled near Philadelphia in 1682, descended from a Norman French nobleman, knighted by William the Conqueror at the Battle of Hastings, 1066."[1] About 1650, some of the prominent members of the family joined the Society of Friends. Harpers are therefore missing from English army records, since the Quakers refused army service and were confined in English prisons. Religious and political persecutions drove many to seek asylum in the New World.

"In 1682, three brothers by the name of Harper sailed for America. One settled in New York, from whom descended the Harper Brothers publishers, (Josiah). Another, with his family, started for Virginia, but was prevented by high water from crossing the Potomac, (John), who settled at Oxford, near Philadelphia. The third settled with his family in Lower Dublin Township, near Philadelphia (Joseph)"[1]

This traditional date of 1682 coincides with a record of the Friends' Monthly Meeting at Philadelphia, noting that JOHN HARPER had been transferred "from Mo. (nthly) Meeting at Barton (England), dated 2 mo 3, 1682."[2]

Apparently the family, like many early Quakers, were fine craftsmen. Joseph Barry, early Harpers Ferry annalist, identifies Robert Harper as a millwright and architect, and states that he built a church for the

The Harper House

Protestant Episcopalians at Frankfort.[3] Robert's brother Joseph is referred to in early accounts as a skilled cabinet maker. His brother Josiah having been concerned with publishing rather than Harper's Ferry, it is to Robert and Joseph Harper that our records relate.

According to Barry, Robert Harper arrived at the confluence of the Shenandoah and Potomac in the spring of 1747, en route to the Opequon near Winchester, where he had engaged to build mills and a meeting house for Quakers from Philadelphia. Impressed by the tremendous surge of rivers, he returned from Winchester to buy the wilderness land at the confluence, and before his death in 1782 had erected a fine mill and begun a stone residence on the rugged hillside.[4] In addition, he chartered the right to run a ferry across the Potomac, and prospered in both his ferry and mill operations.

Mr. Harper is described by Barry as a man of medium height and considerable physical strength. An interesting but undocumented local tradition avers that his sympathies had been Tory, but that becoming convinced of the justice of the colonist's cause, he buried considerable gold on his property to outwit the King's tax collectors.

At the time of Robert Harper's death in 1782, only three structures existed on his wilderness land — his mill on Virginius Island, a house he had built on the Shenandoah near the mill, and a second more elaborate residence nearing completion on the hillside. The latter was the historic Harper House.

Ownership of The Harper House

Part of an impressive purchase totalling over 200 acres, the land on which the Harper House stands was deeded to Robert Harper in a tract of 125 acres April 25, 1751, by Thomas, Lord Fairfax, Proprietor of 5,200,000 acres of land in the Northern Neck of Virginia, by grant from Charles II.[5]

According to Barry, work on the house was halted by lack of workmen, able-bodied residents having joined the army of Washington. Begun in 1775, the house had not been lived in when Harper died in 1782. Perhaps the death of Rachel Harper in the interim further delayed its completion. Childless and a widower, Robert Harper died without immediate heirs. His property at Harpers Ferry was left by will to Sarah Ann, daughter of Robert's brother Joseph of Philadelphia.[6] Sarah Ann Harper married Johannes (John) Wager, Sr., son of Peter Wager, who emigrated from Cleves, Germany, to Philadelphia in 1736.[7]

As absentee landlords, Sarah and Johannes Wager rented the Harper House for use as a tavern until the death of Johannes Wager in 1803. His son John Wager, Jr., who married Catherine Bate in 1799 in Charles Town, inherited the property and apparently moved to Harpers Ferry to make it his home.[8] Extensive architectural changes were made by the Wagers to convert the building from tavern to residence use.

On John Wager, Jr.'s death October 22, 1813, at Harpers Ferry, his estate passed to his widow Catherine and her four children; James Bate Wager, John W. S. Wager (who died in 1823), Gerard Bond Wager and Sarah Ann St. Clair Wager. The family continued to reside in the Harper House until 1831 or 1832.[9] By Catherine Wager's death in 1829, the estate passed to the three surviving children. In July, 1832, James B. Wager leased the Harper House from Gerard Bond and Sarah Ann for the term of eight years at $50 per year, with a clause providing that the latter two would reimburse James B. for improvements on the building.[10]

Extensive investigation by the resident architect substantiates that at this time the Harper House was remodelled and altered as an integral unit of a new mansion of impressive proportions erected next to and adjoining the Harper House by James B. Wager between 1832-1833.[11] By the fall of 1833, James Wager was entangled in financial difficulties and put his lease into trust.[12] In July 1834 he declared himself bankrupt, and the leasehold on the Harper-Wager house was purchased from the trustees by William Anderson at public auction on December 8th of that year.[13] This lease was valid until July, 1840.

In the interest of settling James B. Wager's financial difficulties, the Circuit Superior Court of Law and Chancery for Jeffesron County on April 2, 1835, appointed commissioners to divide the Wager estate into three equal portions among the three surviving heirs, James B., Gerard B. and Sally Anne (Swayne, wife of Noah H. Swayne). On October 10, 1835, the court awarded Sally Anne Swayne the lot on which the Harper House stood, "including the old mansion" — as well as other lots within the Wager Six-Acre Reservation.[14] Noah H. Swayne was then United States Attorney for the District of Ohio (1835-1865), and the Swaynes were in residence in Ohio during this time. In all, forty-three carefully drawn leases, deeds and agreements concerning their Harpers Ferry properties were recorded in the Jefferson County Court House during this period, but an exhaustive search fails to discover a lease or deed for the Harper House itself.

It is known that from 1866 to 1924, the residence was occasionally occupied by the Swayne family, and was used as a home for elderly and indigent members of the family.[15]

During the Swayne's ownership of the Harper House (June 18, 1836) William Anderson and George B. Stephenson purchased, at the public sale of James B. Wager's assets, the Wager house and lot adjoining the Harper House. Architectural investigation shows that the connecting doors installed by James B. Wager were sealed off at this time and the two houses became separate residences.[16]

Messrs. Anderson and Stephenson advertised the Wager House for sale on May 21, 1840, and the sale was finally scheduled July 13, 1840.[17] This date coincides with Marmion family tradition that Dr. Nicholas Marmion purchased the property in 1840. While this important deed is not recorded, subsequent bills for work and materials presently under study in the large collection of Marmion papers on file at Harpers Ferry National Monument indicate that between 1840-1847 Dr. Marmion remodelled the Wager House into a well-furnished town house thereafter called "Marmion Hall," and erected the two tenant houses which completed the presently standing row of buildings adjoining the Harper House.

On July 16, 1924, Noah H. Swayne executed a deed of sale transferring the Harper House and lot to Annie P. Marmion, daughter of Dr. Nicholas. By this deed, the Marmion family became owners of the entire row of four substantial buildings, and ownership passed out of the hands of the Harper descendants.[18]

In 1953, the entire row of four buildings including the Harper House, was acquired by the State of West Virginia for inclusion in Harpers Ferry National Monument from Miss Annie Marmion's nephew and heir, Mr. William P. Marmion of Harpers Ferry, still a resident of the town at this writing.

Use of the Harper House

From the foregoing search of deeds, and extensive architectural and historic research since the establishment of Harpers Ferry National Monument, a variety of conclusions have been reached.

Most logically, uses of the Harper House through the years could be divided as follows:

1775-1782 Under construction by Robert Harper.

1782-1803	Used as a tavern and rented by the Wager family as absentee landlords.
1803-1813	Converted to a residence by John Wager, Jr.
1813-1832	Used as residence by Wager heirs.
1832-1833	Extensively altered by James B. Wager as a corporate part of the new Wager mansion attached on adjoining lot.
1833-1924	Alloted by James Wager's trustees to Sarah Ann Swayne, wife of Noah H. Swayne, and used by the Swayne family intermittently as a residence and as a home for elderly relatives.
1924-1953	Residence of Mr. William V. Marmion of Harpers Ferry.
1950-	Restored by the National Park Service through architectural and historical research to 1859 exterior and interior details.

Present plans include restoration of period furnishings to the Harper House through the generous offer of the Shenandoah-Potomac Garden Council to provide funds by means of an annual House and Garden Tour. Detailed plans for the selection of furniture are under study by the Museum Branch, National Park Service, with co-operation of the Garden Club Council.

"The Harper House has enjoyed, and still does, the distinction of being one of Harpers Ferry's most cherished assets. It is a link in the continuity of the town's history for it has stood from the founder's days of this small village up to the present time. The dramatic scenes that the occupants of this dwelling have witnessed, from its vantage point on the hillside are the basis for interpretation of the area. As the home of the influential Wager family it served in style and construction features as a prototype for many of the buildings subsequently built in the lower town area." [19]

When furnished and open for public inspection, it would offer an opportunity to portray the domestic conditions of the Civil War period, in the key residence of a vital area.

The Franks' "Baker House"

THE FRANKS' "BAKER HOUSE"

The "Baker house," still frequently so called, though now the home of Dr. Guy Frank, college professor, was one of the first brick dwellings in Shepherdstown. The date of its erection is well established by a letter received by George Michael Bedinger, then at Limestone, Kentucky, from his Shepherdstown mother, Magdalene Bedinger, in June, 1793. It said "One thing I would recommend to you that is to be Carefull as possible of Running into debt about Building your House, as that was the principal Cause of Mr. Spalding's ruin."

It seems too bad that the history of the house should begin in tragedy. As for Mr. Spaulding, 1793 marked the end of his real estate ventures; some years later he was advertising himself as a "cedar cooper."

On September 18, 1790, William Spaulding had bought the western half of Lot 7 from Conrad Byers. How much he went into debt while building thereon and to whom is only fairly apparent. In the Potowmack Guardian, December, 1798, John Mark advertised the lot as having a "large and convenient brick house formerly owned by Mr. Spaulding." The "counting room" mentioned in the advertisement was doubtless the small wing on the west end, probably added by Mr. Mark, a man of many business interests.

On December 22, 1800, the property was deeded by John Mark to his son-in-law, John Baker. When Michael Rickard, on the eastern half of Lot 7, wrote his will on July 31, 1809, he had John Baker living next door. Apparently, John Baker and his wife Ann lived there until they bought the present Episcopal Rectory on May 5, 1817. So, from 1811 to 1813 the house had its proprietor serving in the U. S. Congress. It was the birthplace of the five Baker sons and three daughters, the oldest of whom, Ann C., married Thomas W. Gilmer, one-time Governor of Virginia.

From the death of John Baker in 1823 till 1847, after the death of his wife Ann, the place was held by the Baker heirs. Then, in a chancery suit brought by John K. White and his wife Ellen M., a daughter of John Baker, against Samuel D. Baker, oldest son, and others, Jas. S. Markell was named commissioner by court decree, and sold the place to Edward C. Williams on April 26, 1853.

Again, a tinge of tragedy entered the history of the house; at least that is what the new owner thought.

The diary of Edward C. Williams, handwritten late in life, tells how he had a good farm near Swan Pond and a good medical practice composed of 75 families. His wife, however, wanted to move to town, though he thought the farm would have been a better place for his boys. He felt keenly his losses while in Shepherdstown, professionally, and particularly what he sustained on the "Baker house." He had paid $500 more for it in 1853 than he was forced to accept in 1858, when it was taken over by Mary A. (Billmyer), wife of Elias Baker. The loss was attributed to a fire during his occupancy.

Then a new era of a legally titled "Baker house" began. The earlier one lasted 53 years, but this one was to continue for 62.

W. N. Lemen, who married a sister of Mrs. Elias Baker, kept a diary from 1839 to 1860, which contained this item: "Mar. 4, 1858, Elias Baker moved to the Williams house." The deed from Williams, however, was dated April 1, 1858, but in those days a family frequently had possession of property before getting a deed for it.

By March 5, 1858, six sons and two daughters had been born to Elias and Mary Billmyer Baker. The oldest son, Newton Diehl Baker, father of the Secretary of War in Wilson's cabinet, completed his medical education at the University of Maryland in 1868, and came back home to practice medicine for one year before moving to Martinsburg. An inference that he used the small wing on the west end of the "Baker house" for his office is not in line with a newspaper notice on May 2, 1868, that he had his office with Dr. R. P. Magruder one square east on the other side of the street.

Appointed town postmaster, Elias Baker served from 1862 till his death in May, 1867, handing out mail from David Billmyer's store on the northeast corner of Main and Church. A Union sympathizer, though his son Newton Diehl served in the Confederate Army, he followed the plan of sending his older daughter Kate out on the street to see whether the Federals or Confederates held the town before he'd go to the postoffice.

Mrs. Baker, postmaster from 1867 to 1869, lived till 1896, when she still had with her, at home, sons "B" (Martin Billmyer) Baker, and Henry S. and his children. Her grandson, little "Newtie" Baker, later Secretary of War, frequently came down from Martinsburg to visit her and played in the yard back of the house, all the while sniffing the air for the smell of cookies emanating from the Rickard kitchen next door. There was a gate conveniently connecting the Baker and Rickard properties.

The Baker occupancy ended in 1906, when the place was rented, first to Henry Wirgman, principal of the graded school, and later to Dr. Nathaniel Burwell. There from 1910 to 1918 Dr. Burwell had his office in the wing on the west end.

By 1920 Henry S. Baker had bought out the other heirs, and on January 8, 1921, conveyed the property to Annie F. Jones, wife of Thomas F. Jones. The Jones family had moved into the house in April, 1919, there to care for the invalid husband and father, who died in May 1923.

On August 20, 1952, Miss Sallie Jones, now owning and occupying the Rickard house next door, bought out the other Jones heirs, and sold the old Baker place on October 21, 1955, to Edward W. Johnson, who made repairs and interior improvements before selling the property to Dr. and Mrs. Guy Frank on September 10, 1957.

Mrs. Frank describes the house as a good example of Georgian Colonial architecture. It is rectangular in shape and is built around a central stair-hall. A unique feature of the stairway is that it opens to the rear of the house rather than to the front. So far as known, only four early Shepherdstown houses have had this type of stairway. Also, like some other dwellings built in the early 1790's, its brick walls were laid in Flemish bond, and the lower three or four feet, capped by a curved "half brick," were set out about an inch farther, making what is known as a water-table.

The house consists of eight rooms and two baths. All rooms have the traditional high ceilings and deep-set windows. The large rectangular fireplace in the living room has been restored to the original brick. The mantel and doorways are distinctive for their fine wood carvings. Of special interest are the large strap hinges found on all doors. The old pine floors have been restored to their original warmth and beauty. Standing in front of the house one may view an elaborate ornamental cornice, crowning the wall and just under the edge of the roof.

At first, the front of the house was entered from a small brick stoop, with steps on either side, but in 1923 the Jones family replaced this with a rather long covered porch of wood. In the early years an enclosed back porch had been used as a place to serve food carried up from the original basement kitchen, with its huge fireplace.

In 1957 Mr. Johnson tore this down to its foundation and built a new open porch.

The room to the west, which was once a "counting room" and in later years a doctor's office, now serves as a family room or den. Plans for the future call for the restoration of the original kitchen beneath the present living room.

WOMAN'S SUFFRAGE HINGE OF FATE

Many present day voters may assume that woman's suffrage has always been in effect, and many more are unaware that the vote of a State Senator from Jefferson County turned the tide toward West Virginia's favorable vote on the Nineteenth Amendment giving nation-wide suffrage to women and providing the 36th State needed to ratify it.

In Jefferson County in November 1916 the vote on an amendment to West Virginia's Constitution was 2,243 against woman's suffrage and only 733 for. When Senator Milton Burr went to Charleston in 1920 he was opposed to the National Amendment and would vote against it. By some unusual procedure, the State Senate reconsidered the measure subsequent to its rejection in the same session.

The heat was then put on Senator Burr to vote for its ratification. Actually, he was between two fires, as shown by 54 telegrams now in possession of Miss Anna McGarry, a relative. Here are a few: (1) Don't help W. Va. insult its women citizens. Vote for the amendment. (2) Stand by your guns against ratification. Your friends are with you. (3) Please ratify the suffrage amendment. Do not let the liquor interests of Maryland run our legislature. (4) We are opposed to the ratification of the Amendment. . . . Voters of Duffields.

Finally came a telegram from the White House, addressed to Hon. Milton Burr, State Senate, Charleston, W. Va., as follows:

May I not urge upon you the importance to the whole country of the prompt ratification of the Suffrage Amendment and express the hope that you will find it possible to lend your aid to this end.

Woodrow Wilson

Shortly after receipt of that telegram from his President, Senator Burr voted for the amendment, and that was the "hinge of fate."

WIZARD CLIP AND PRIEST'S FIELD

(What has been called "the truest ghost story ever told" appears here, in brief, by request of several readers who wish to be able to turn to it readily. Also, frequent inquiries come from those in distant places whose ancestors lived at Middleway or "Clip.")

In the year 1790 Adam Livingston came from Lancaster, Pa., and settled on a tract of seventy acres he had purchased near Smithfield (now Middleway) in Jefferson County. All went well for four years. Some time in 1794 a stranger, finding no room in Smith's Tavern, appeared late in the evening at Livingston's home and asked for accommodations. The stranger seemed to be ill and his host was unable to get any information about the man, not even his name.

In the middle of the night the Livingstons heard groans from the stranger's room. At length they decided to enter the room of their mysterious guest, only to learn that he felt his end was near and wanted a priest. Mrs. Livingston's Protestant leanings were too strong to permit a priest's entering her home. When she suggested a preacher of her own creed might be had, the stranger was heard to mutter "A curse if I die unshriven." The stranger then lapsed into a coma, and after some time Mr. Livingston said "The man is dead."

The next night a neighbor named Foster agreed to keep wake, but excused himself early and went home. One after another set of candles in the dead man's room had flickered and gone out. Though Livingston just couldn't stay in the room, he had a bad night of it, hearing much, such as a horse galloping around and around the house, but able to see nothing though the moon was shining brightly.

On the following day a number of his neighbors helped Livingston to convey the body to a portion of his land now called Priest's Field, near Opequon Creek, and there it was interred.

Then Livingston's worries began with a vengeance. After supper when he sat by his fireplace, the glowing coals began to skip and hop, and then flitted about the room, but that came to an end after a pail of water was applied to the fireplace. Strange manifestations by day and night were soon driving Livingston to distraction. The strangest of all was the sound of invisible scissors and the clipping of cloth. This brought many visitors to the Livingston home to witness the damage done by the scissors, usually cuts in half-moon shape, and possibly to pass judgment on his sanity. One of them, a pious woman, saying she had no fear of evil spirits and besides her clothing was too old to make any difference, entered the room of the stranger, inadvertently carrying a silk night cap in her pocket. She came out with her clothing intact, but to the amazement of all, when she withdrew the night cap from her pocket, they saw that it had been cut into a myriad of small half-moon shaped shreds.

No less than three conjurers, it has been said, undertook to exorcise the spirit, but their incantations merely infuriated the evil genius.

Then one night Livingston had a dream in which he found himself in a precarious position at the top of a steep mountain. There he saw a man in clerical robes and heard a voice say "This is the man who can help you." Next day he rode to Winchester and interviewed the Episcopal rector there, but had no satisfaction. He returned home and the strange occurances continued. Three months of tribulation had humbled Livingston, so he agreed to follow the suggestion of Joseph Minghini that he see a priest. He consulted Richard McSherry, a a Roman Catholic living at "Retirement" near Leetown. On the next Sunday morning Livingston, McSherry and Minghini went to Shepherdstown, where Father Dennis Cahill, of Frederick, Md., was holding mass in the little church on the "Chapel Lot" at the west end of town. (Abraham Shepherd had recently deeded one and a half acres to Clement Pierce and Joseph Clarke, Trustees, and their successors forever, for the use of the Roman Church and Burying Ground.)

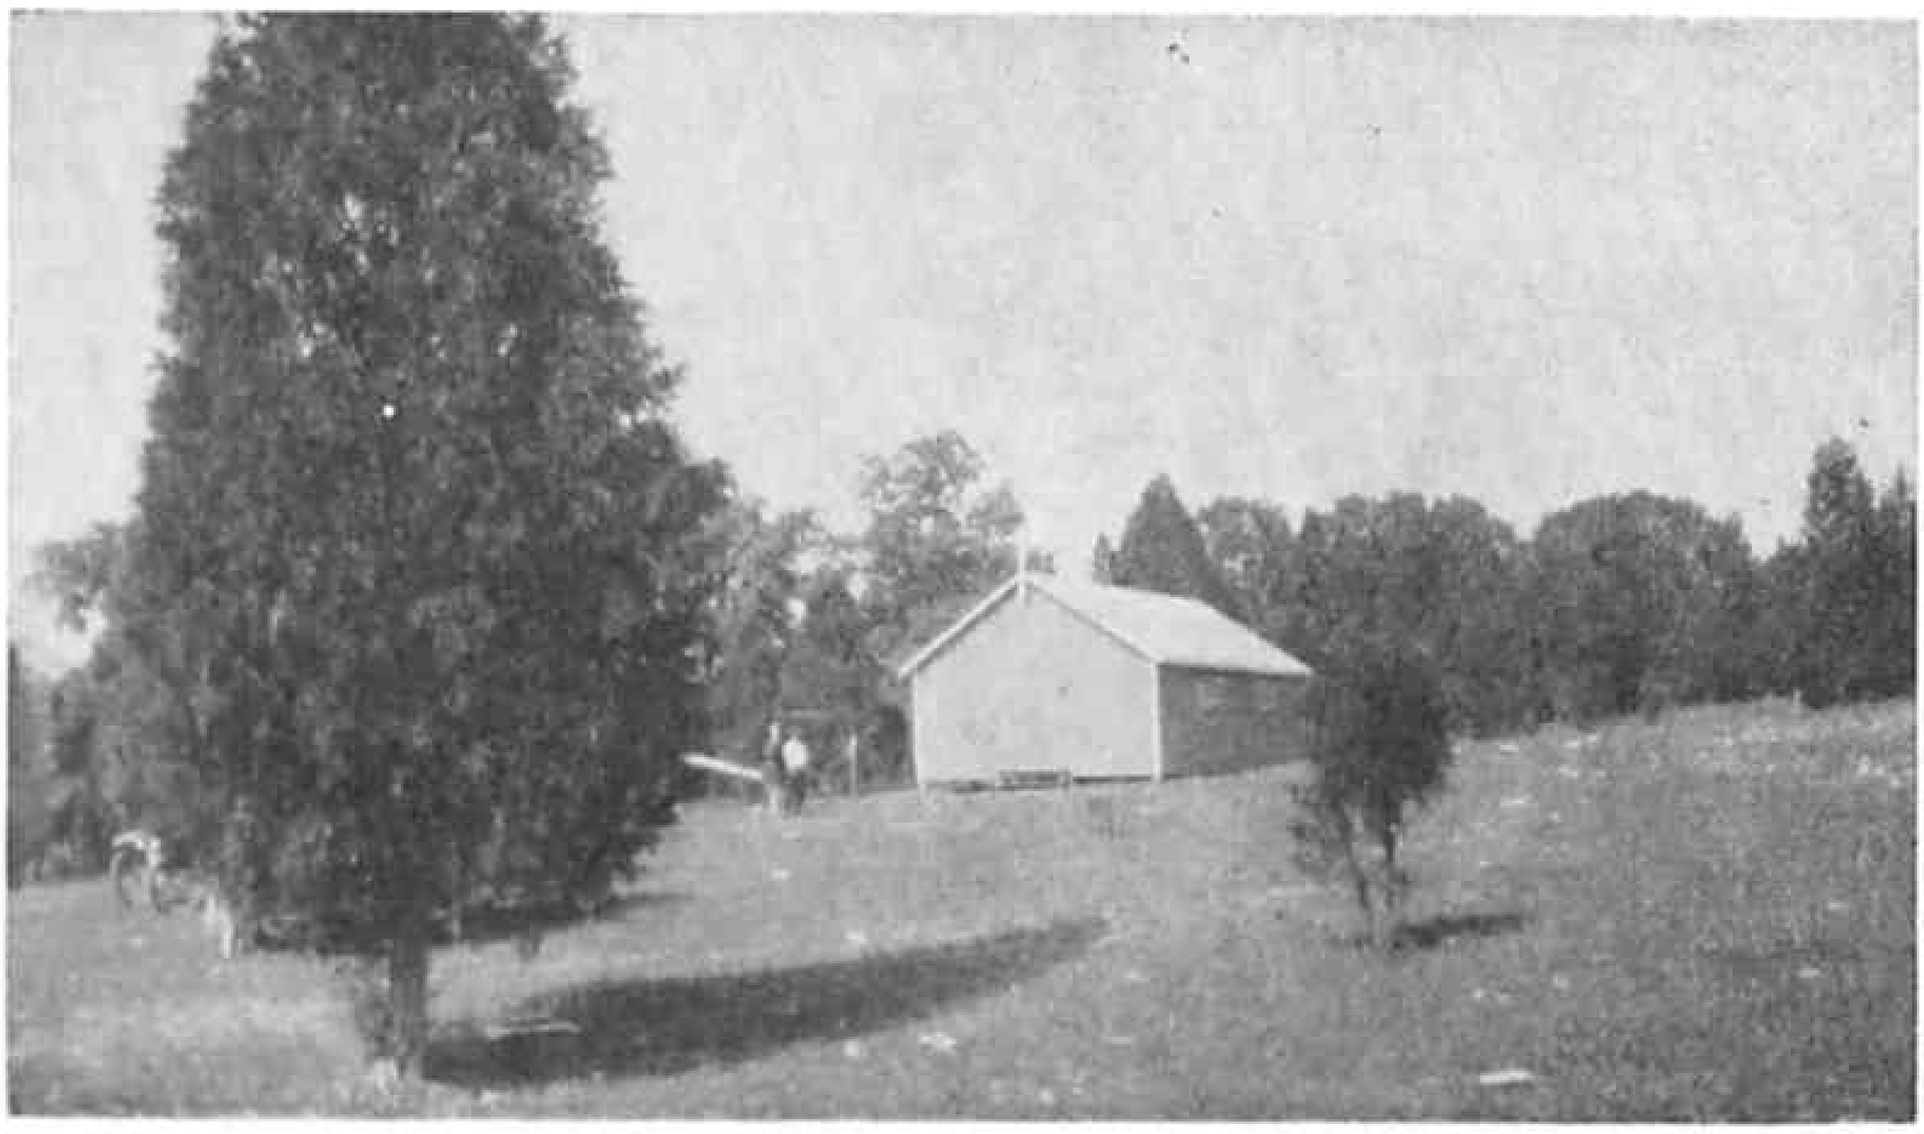

Livingston recognized Father Cahill as the man of his dream, and at the close of the service, by insistent urging, prevailed upon him to go to Middleway. The priest sprinkled the house with holy water, but the manifestations were only slightly modified. A few days later Father Cahill said mass for the repose of the soul of the stranger, and the uncanny annoyances ceased forever.

Livingston naturally felt that he was under obligation to the priest, who declined to accept a gift. Accordingly, an agreement was reached, by which a tract of 34 acres, thereafter known as Priest's Field, was deeded by Livingston to Dennis Cahill, Richard McSherry, Joseph Minghini, Clement Pierce and Joseph Clarke, trustees for the Catholic Church, on February 21, 1802.

Years later the trustees had all died and Minghini heirs had taken posession of the land. About 120 years after the deed was given the Catholics brought suit to regain possession. Circuit Judge J. M. Woods, of Martinsburg, decided in favor of the church, declaring that a trust could not be vitiated simply because trustees had died, and appointing as new trustees Bishop O'Connell, of Richmond, Rev. J. A. Curran, of Harpers Ferry, and William Butler, of Shepherdstown.

On November 2, 1922, the recovery of Priest's Field was celebrated, with Bishop O'Connell, Rev. Albert E. Smith, editor of the Baltimore Catholic Review, and other church dignitaries assembled somewhere near the spot where the unnamed stranger and overnight guest of Adam Livingston lies buried. There a neat little chapel, under Catholic auspices, was built in the year 1923, being first used on November 2, 1923.

A more extended account of Wizard Clip may be found in the two-volume History of Middleway by Colonel Robert L. Bates.

SHEPHERDSTOWN BICENTENNIAL

Observance of the Bicentennial of the Shepherdstown Charter was planned by the Historic Shepherdstown Commission to present a glimpse into the history of the old town through the years — the people, their churches, homes, craftsmanship, schools and customes. Its program extended from October 20 through November 30, 1962.

However, The Independent, now the town's only newspaper, independently began the observance by publishing, on the first Wednesday in January, the first of a series of sketches of Prominent Men of Shepherdstown During Its First 200 Years. Each week the paper has had a sketch of some prominent man, no longer living, and will continue such until fifty sketches have appeared. They were written by a member of the Historic Shepherdstown Commission.

Also antedating the October 20 to November 30 observance was a telephone call on August 31 from Mayor Louis Scribner, of Charlottesville, Va., to Mayor Walter Knott, of Shepherdstown, extending felicitations and referring to the chartering of the two towns in the English colony of Virginia on the same day and their both being named for Charlotte of Mecklenburg, who became the wife of King George III of England late in 1761. Charlottesville and Mecklenburg (later called Shepherd's Town and finally Shepherdstown) were chartered at a time when it was popular to name towns and counties for the new Queen. The telephone call did not refer to Thomas Shepherd's having arrived by 1734 and having sold some twenty lots about a decade before his town was chartered as Mecklenburg in 1762.

The planned bicentennial observance, skillfully publicized throughout, began, for most of the visitors, with the appearance of the Old Guard Fife and Drum Corps of the U. S. Army during the interval between halves of the homecoming football game at Shepherd College. In their colorful uniforms, they presented "A Day in the Life of a Revolutionary Soldier," featuring the tunes and drumbeats which regulated the life of the Revolutionary soldier, and demonstrations to illustrate the calls.

On the same day the Woman's Club opened a Museum, exhibiting many and varied articles treasured as heirlooms by descendants of the town's early settlers. The Museum had an almost constant stream of visitors during the eight days it was open.

On Sunday, October 21, the first Old Homes Tour brought visitors from Idaho, Maryland, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Virginia and South Carolina, as well as the neighboring county of Berkeley. The second Old Homes Tour, showing a different list of homes, was held on Sunday, November 11.

A Walking Tour on the afternoon of October 21 made the rounds of fourteen historic spots, at each of which there were two girls of the Rumsey Climbers 4-H Club, in period costumes, who related the history of the place.

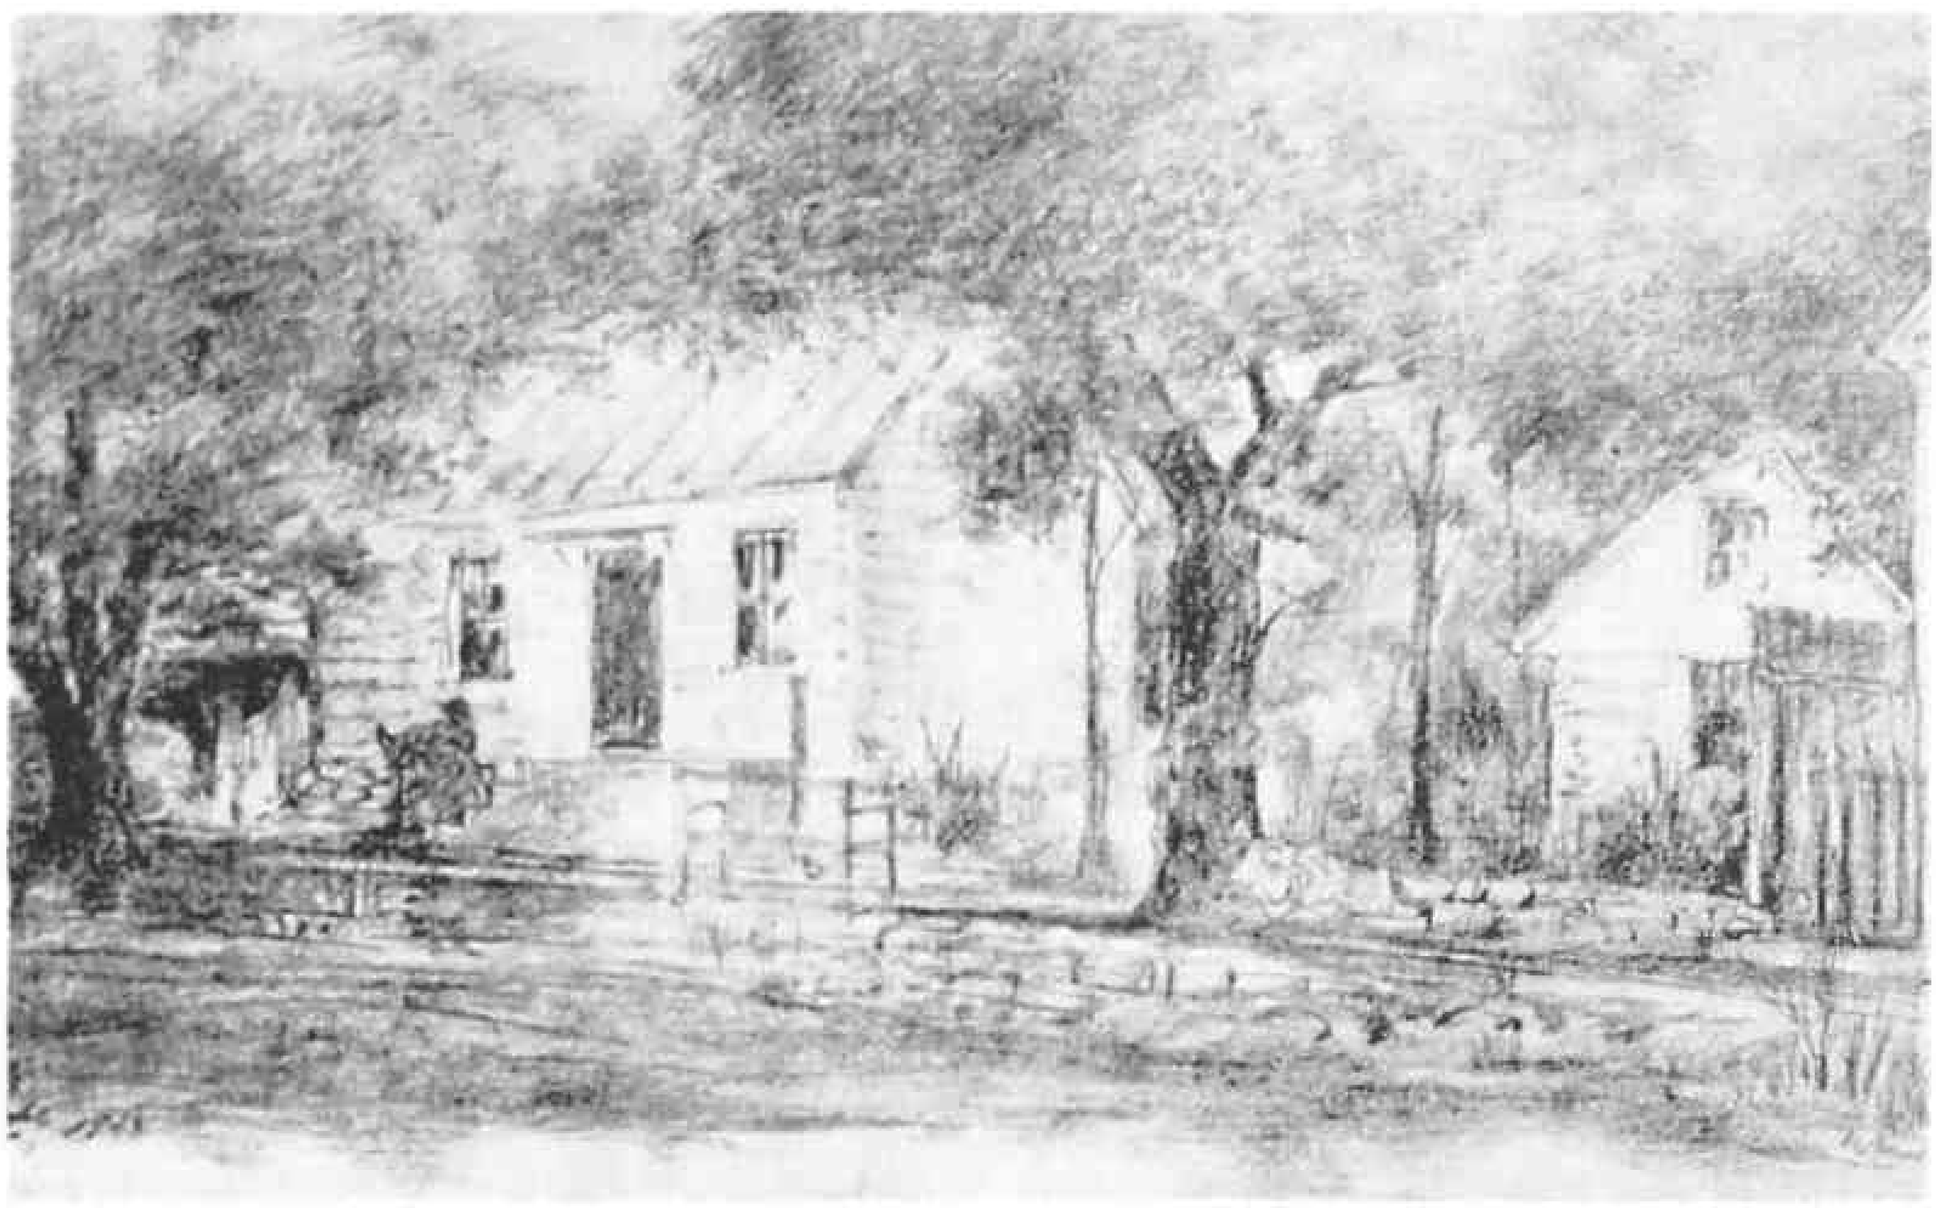

On November 17 the local A. A. U. W. had a display of early arts and crafts, an account of their history, and a lecture by Curator G. Carrol Lindsay, Museum Service, Smithsonian Institution.

The churches of the town and immediate area had at different times commemorative services and hymn sings. Mention of an exhibit by the Lutheran Church of parish records in German, a 1774 Hymnal and Bible in German, and handicraft made by German Lutheran artisans of Mecklenburg, is indicative of the total display of ancient treasures of the several churches. A rather unusual service called the Lighted Lamps was held at the New Street Methodist Church, when its pastor revived the Circuit Rider days by appearing on horseback, later meeting his congregation in the church lighted only by lanterns.

There were other events in which the people of the town cooperated to recall its past 200 years, such as an old-fashioned square dance, a parade of old fire fighting engines, apple butter boiling, an old-time soup, and concerts by German bands.

The whole observance was home-planned and non-commercial. Old homes had been restored, residential and business buildings on the main street had been freshly painted and brightened by "window box" plantings, and the old town in general was readied for the very special anniversary celebration.

The Drama Department of Shepherd College closed the bicentennial observance on November 29 and 30 by presenting Royall Tyler's The Contrast, the first American comedy and first presented in New York in 1787. This was a revival of its performance in Shepherdstown on July 12, 1791, by McGrath's Company of Comedians.

A TALE FROM TERRAPIN NECK

By Dr. John P. Goulding

To entertain the children in the lazy summer evenings when the light lingers on the mountains to the west lenghthening the time between the labors of the fields and actual bedtime, many a dam has figuratively been built across the Potomac. The one dam that captures the imagination of even the smallest child, is the one at Harpers Ferry. It backed water up so deep and so far, that a tremendous lake was all over everywhere. The tops of the Blue Ridge were the shore lines. The Indians and wild animals slept by the waters edge.

As the river ceaselessly eats its way to the sea, it has many a tall tale to tell. There is a steadiness about the river and this steadiness seeps into the life along its banks. The magic and the mystery is always there. At times the steady alluring temperament changes and quickly too. Very often when it does. the very lives of the people along its banks, even the course of human events are changed.

One evening, Brownie related the tale of the '89 flood. "I was just a boy then playing marbles on the berm in front of grandpap's warehouse and store. He had stored all kinds of stuff and feed for the canal company mules. On this particular day, lots of buggies and wagons went by, all headed for Sharpsburg. About everybody would be in Sharpsburg. There would be a parade. They would get drunk and then they would get into fights. Those fellas coming back to visit the battlefield would always start it.

"It was Memorial Day — a bright clear day which seemed good after the rainy spell. Grandpap called for me to get in the boat and slip across the canal to the towpath with him. I gave the boat a good shove and we glided across. When I jumped out there was that big brindle cow grazing on the towpath. She didn't like me so I skirted around her. Grandpap and I walked down to the river's edge. The water came surging in then went out a little and then surged in again. It was pretty muddy. 'Brownie,' Grandpap said, 'drive that cow across the canal and go and get Gator and tell him to bring a couple of mules to the warehouse. Hurry up! The river is coming up fast.'

"Gator came right down with the mules hitched to a big wagon. Everybody worked fast. The river really looked mad. Drift was running. Grandpap and the rest of us, all straining, got the big old heavy desk loaded with Grandpap's papers on the wagon. Next we struggled with the strong box and got it on. Gator drove the mules up the hill to Grandpap's house where we unloaded the wagon. We hurried down the hill to get on a load of flour. Old Gator was cursing the mules and spitting tobacco juice. He was mumbling about everyone having gone to the battlefield getting drunk and here we were in this fix.

"We looked up the canal. A two foot wall of water came a rolling down. 'She's already over the towpath above the dam. The garlock must be half open. The river is going crazy mad.' said Grandpap.

"Hurry as fast as we could the river hurried faster. Water was already running on the berm where we were playing marbles earlier in the day. Mice and rats and snakes came swimming across from the towpath. Here came a rabbit swimming across.

"It was no use. We had no help. The water came up, up, up. Drift was running fast — great big islands of it. Small buildings were coming down. Here came a big strawstack sailing down. There were two black hens and a Dominique rooster up on the top. Two big hogs were caught in the current and swept past.

"The water was up around the warehouse. Grandpap made us get back up the hill lest it might topple off its foundations. The sun was low in the sky shining red up the river making it look gory with heavy red clay. A few people began to trickle back from Sharpsburg. They had forgotten about the excitement there. The river was the thing. Everybody talked about the river. What was going to happen? The river was still raising, raising. It was just about dark when Grandpap said, 'There she goes." The warehouse had a tight floor. The water just floated it and the current eased it off of its rock foundations. It moved ever so slow. It seemed as if you could of put your hand on it and stopped it, it moved so slow. Out into the current it went, and us all standin there helpless. It gained speed, caught in an eddy she swerved out over the towpath. It seemed to flounder for a moment then it moved out. As darkness closed in we could see the outline of the roof as it went around the bend of Tarpin Neck. The river had taken away.

"Grandpap's fortune and business floated off together with much of what might have been. That was a 'memorial' day — a memorable day in the year of '89."

I knew that Brownie had finished his tale, so I interupted him: "I guess your grandpap had no insurance?"

"No." he said, "Nobody much knew about insurance in those days in these parts. When grandpap died we didn't inherit much. That is the way the river does. It gives and it takes. Look at Shepherdstown. In that same flood the bridge went out. All the business you might say from the Maryland side was cut off. It never came back to be much of a manufacturing town after that."

"Brownie," who related this tale as one of his old age reminiscences, lived for many years in that part of Terrapin Neck which lies across from Mercersville.

GOVERNMENT TABLETS NEAR PACK HORSE FORD

Along the River Road, between the old cement mill and the ford one and one-eighth mile below Shepherdstown, there were, for nearly seventy years, five U. S. Government tablets or markers, about four feet by three, telling what took place there in the way of military movements and conflict just before and after the Battle of Antietam or Sharpsburg. Nearly two years ago three of them disappeared from the scene. Two have recently been replaced, but number two is still missing.

Since visitors to that historic place have been unable to read from the tablets the inscriptions they bore, there is presented herewith a copy of them made while the tablets were all still there. The U. S. Government played safe, using ambiguous labels at the lower right hand corner of the tablets — BF1, BF2, BF3, BF4, and BF5. To a Marylander the BF would signify Blackford's Ford, but to a Virginian it would be Boteler's Ford.

The inscriptions follow in order of numbering:

This crossing of the Potomac was known as Boteler's, Blackford's or the Shepherdstown Ford. By it five divisions of the Army of Northern Virginia, coming from Harper's Ferry, crossed into Maryland, September 16 and 17, 1862, and marched to the field of Antietam. Jackson's and Ewell's Divisions crossed the ford on the morning of the 16th; McLaws' and R. H. Anderson's Divisions before sunrise on the 17th, and A. P. Hill's Division about noon of the same day. During the night of the 18th, and early morning of the 19th, the entire army recrossed from Maryland covered by artillary in positions on the Virginia bluffs overlooking the river.

B. F. 1

(September 19, 1862)

The Army of Northern Virginia, General R. E. Lee, commanding crossed Blackford's Ford during the night of September 18, 1862, and on the morning of the 19th took up its line of march in the direction of Williamsport. Lawton's and Armistead's Brigades were left to guard the ford and forty-four guns were placed on the bluffs, north and south of this point, to check the Union pursuit. Heavy artillery firing and infantry sharpshooting continued the day, by which some of the Confederate artillery was silenced. At dark, while the Confederate artillery was being withdrawn, detachments from the 4th Michigan, 18th and 22d Massachusetts, and 118th Pennsylvania Infantry, under command of Brigadier General Charles Griffin, crossed the ford, forced back Lawton's and Armistead's brigades and captured two guns which were taken across the river. Griffin remained on this side between two and three hours and then recrossed to Maryland. Early on the morning of the 20th the 4th Michigan and 62d Pennsylvania Infantry crossed to this side of the river and secured three guns and several caissons. Returning to the Maryland side at 8 A.M.

B. F. 2

(September 20, 1862)

Early in the morning of September 20, movements were made by Gen. McClellan to ascertain the position of the Army of Northern Virginia. Maj. Charles S. Lovell's Brigade (1st and 6th, and 10th, the 11th and the 17th U. S. Infantry) Syke's Division, Fifth Corps, crossed the Ford and pushed out on the Charlestown Road. Barnes' Brigade, Morell's Division, was ordered to cross and move on Shepherdstown. Lovell had gone about a mile and a half on the Charlestown Road when he met the Confederates in force. The brigade was deployed, about-faced and fell back to the bluffs bordering the river and on either side of the Charlestown Road. The 2d and 10th Infantry were deployed as skirmishers in a belt of woods on the left front. Warren's Brigade (5th and 10th New York Infantry) Sykes' Division, crossed at the Ford and formed on Lovell's left. Barnes, being ordered by Sykes to form on Lovell's right, suspended his movement on Shepherdstown and went into position west of the Mill, 220 yards north of this point. Lovell's skirmishers and some cavalry, which had crossed and gone to the front, were now pressed back by the advance of A. P. Hill's Confederate Division, and Sykes ordered the entire command to recross the Potomac, which was done in good order by Lovell's and Warren's Brigades. The Confederate advance on the part of the line held by them being checked by the fire of Weed's, Randal's and Van Reed's batteries posted on the heights on the Maryland side of the river. Barnes' Brigade, the last ordered withdrawn, met with great loss at the Mill and on the bluffs and river bank beyond.

(September 20, 1862)

Barnes' Brigade of Morell's Division, Fifth Corps, crossed the Potomac at the Ford 420 yards south of this, at 9 A.M., September 20, under orders to march on the road to Shepherdstown. When it became known that A. P. Hill's Confederate Division was in front and advancing, General Sykes ordered the brigade to suspend its movement on Shepherdstown and take position on the right of Lovell's Brigade, which was on the bluffs south of this point. The greater part of the brigade pushed part way up the slope of the bluffs a few yards west of this, with skirmishes thrown well to the front; the 118th Pennsylvania advanced up the bluff north of this point to extend the brigade line to the right. The formation of the line had not been completed when the brigade was ordered to be withdrawn. That portion of the brigade in front and to the left of this was withdrawn, under fire, and recrossed the river in good order and with slight loss, but the 118th Pennsylvania was attacked by A. P. Hill's division and suffered severely in killed, wounded and prisoners.

118th PENNSYLVANIA INFANTRY

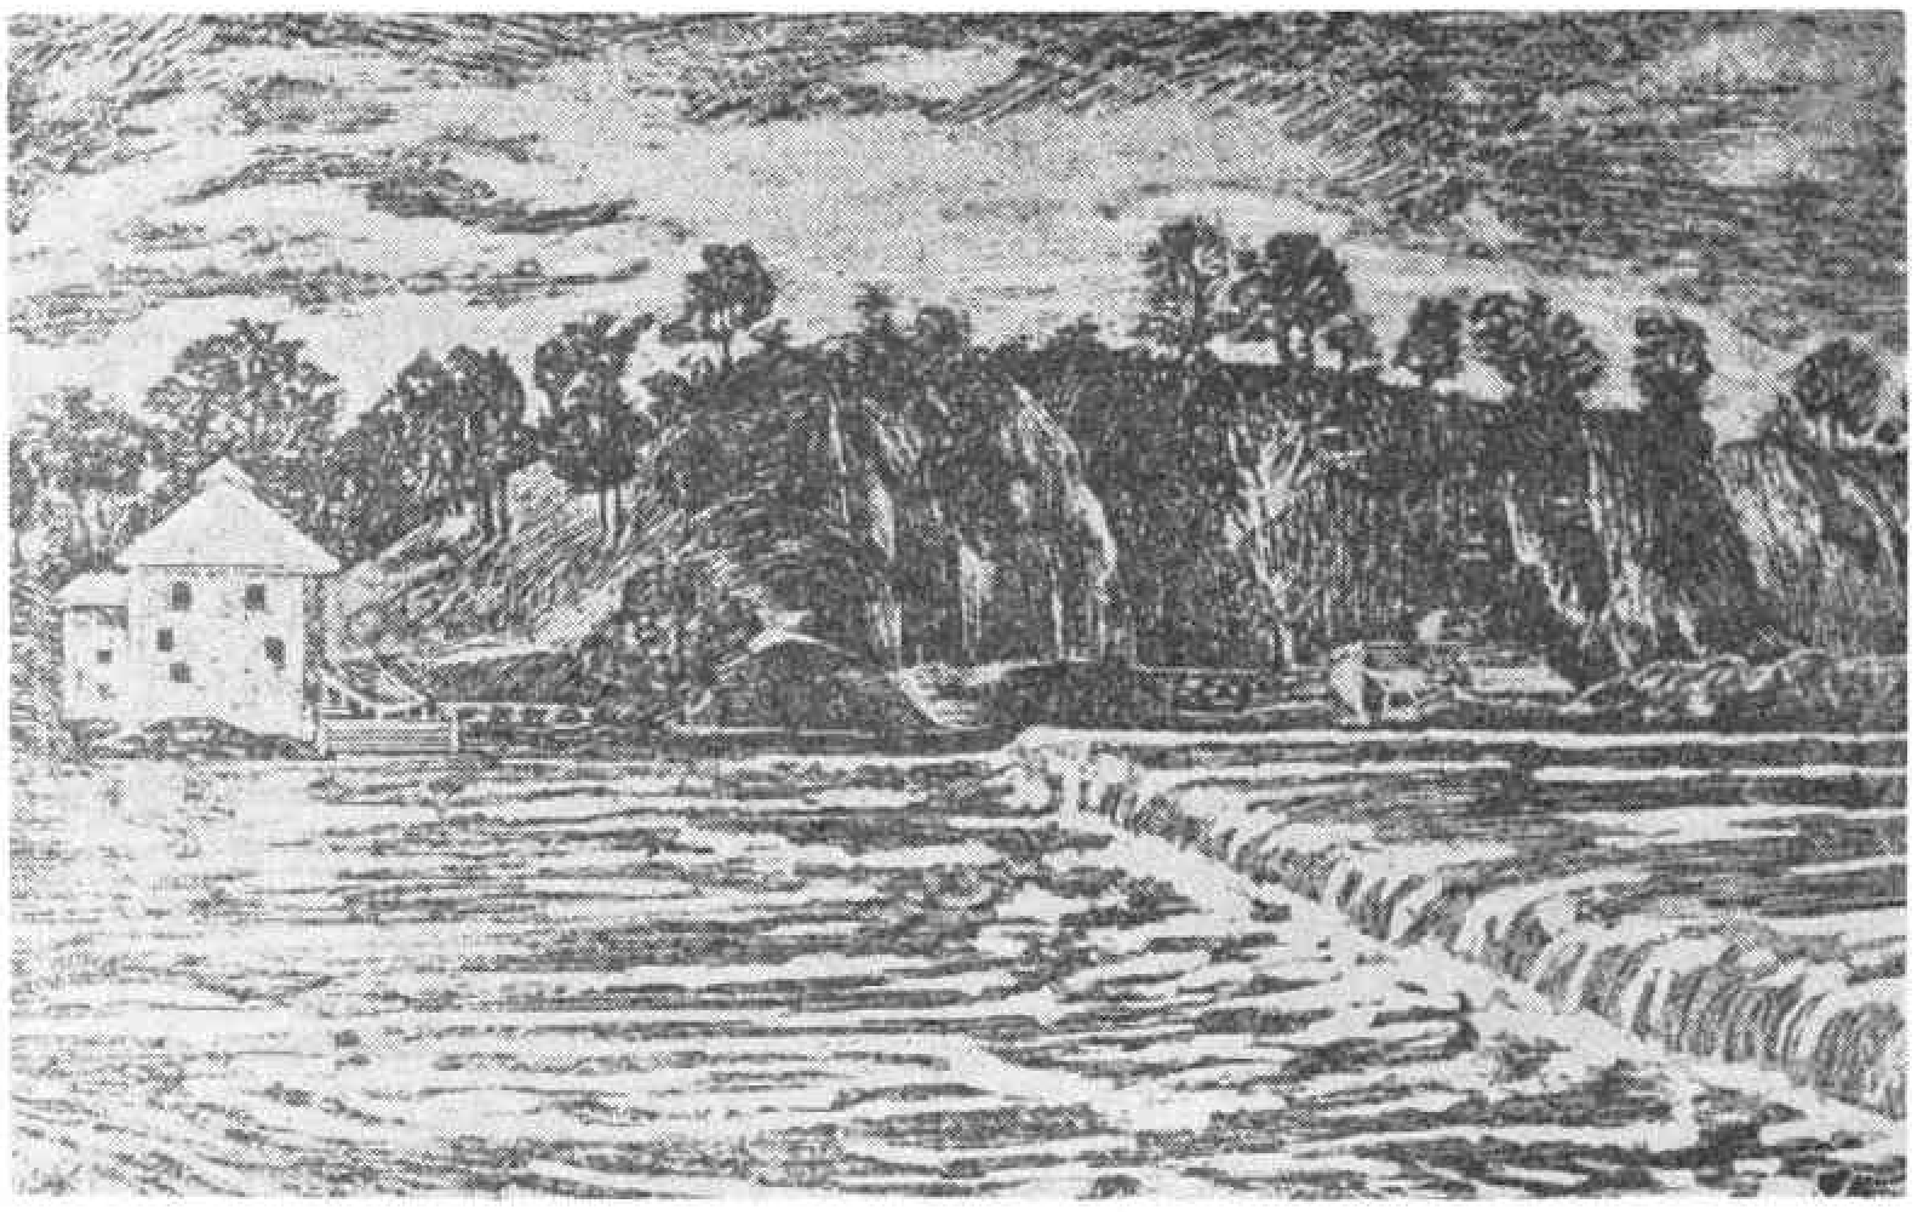

COLONEL CHARLES M. PROVOST, COMMANDING

(Corn Exchange Regiment)

(September 20, 1862)

The 118th Pennsylvania Infantry (737 officers and men) crossed the river by the Ford south of this and was ordered into position on the bluff running north from this point. The regiment ascended the bluffs and had not compleaely formed line — 375 to 425 yards north of this and about 125 yards west of the River Road — when it was attacked in front and on both flanks by A. P. Hill's division and, after a short and sanguinary engagement, was obliged to retire in considerable confusion, many of the men escaping by this ravine, others being drawn over the precipitous bluff north and killed or mangled; many were captured. Some recrossed the river at the ford, some by the breast of the dam, 13 yards north of this, others swam the stream above the dam, or crossed between the dam and ford. Numbers were killed while crossing, by the Confederates, who advanced to the edge of the bluff, some of them occupying the Mill and firing from its windows. Others were drowned. The loss of the regiment was 63 killed, 101 wounded, and 105 captured or missing. The loss of A. P. Hill's Division in the day's operation was 30 killed and 231 wonuded.

PEN SKETCHES USED IN HISTORY
CORN EXCHANGE REGIMENT

Three pen sketches which were used, in 1905, in "The History of the 118th Pennsylvania Volunteers (Corn Exchange Regiment)" have been supplied this Magazine by Dr. H. W. Fraley, Leechburg, Pa. Two of them are reproduced herewith — The Corn Exchange Regiment entering the Ford from the Maryland side, and the Cement Mill and Dam.

Corn Exchange Regiment

Dr. Fraley has been a collector of rare books relating to the Civil War in this area. His grandfather, Dan W. Fraley, was a member of the 1st Maryland Volunteer Cavalry, and in his boyhood was living in Shepherdstown. His grandfather had two brothers in Rosser's Brigade, Army of Northern Virginia, Dave and James Fraley. Miss Lavetta Fraley, of Shepherdstown, is a granddaughter of James Fraley. Of course this is not the only case in which brothers were enlisted in the opposing armies.

The History of the Corn Exchange Regiment, besides having some beautiful word pictures of the local countryside, is interesting reading, and not offensive to adherents of the Southern cause, unless the following should be taken as such: ". . . and the Confederates seem to believe that it (meaning the Battle of the Cement Mill) ended with 'an appalling scene of the destruction of human life.' Jackson, whose words these are, must have been imposed upon by A. P. Hill, who had charge of the operation, and whose report contains these assertions: 'Then commenced the most terrible slaughter that this war has yet witnessed. The broad surface of the Potomac was blue with the floating bodies of our foe. But few escaped to tell the tale. By their own account they lost 3,000 men killed and drowned from one brigade alone.' " (Reference may be had to the inscriptions on the Government tablets placed near the old Cement Mill, after the Official Records of the Union and Confederate Armies, and the History of the Corn Exchange Regiment, were published.)

The History is also critical of Colonel Barnes, commanding the brigade of which the Corn Exchange Regiment was a part. "Colonel Barnes, in his official report, unfairly, if that be not too mild a term, states the severe loss attending the affair as having fallen generally on all the regiments of his brigade, when, in fact, it fell entirely on the 118th Pennsylvania (Corn Exchange Regiment), which alone of all his regiments was actually engaged."

The History rather naturally is full of praise for the Corn Exchange Regiment. It mentions the fact that the regiment had been put upon the hill-top at the head of the Trough Road "to do battle against the veterans of A. P. Hill and Stonewall Jackson . . . with but twenty days' experience in the field; with no opportunity for drill or instruction, . . ." "Though it was clear that the situation was a grave one, yet the 118th Pennsylvania was permitted to mount the cliff with its front entirely uncovered." It admittedly met disaster, yet the staying qualities of its new recruits, with all their inexperience and defective rifles, changed the attitude of the experienced soldiers in the brigade.

"The 118th's reception in the brigade was not attended by any joyous, gladsome shouts, nor was it exempt from the intimation that its presence at the front was largely due to the paltry shekels. The stolid indifference it met at every hand during the few days previous to the fight was frequently accompanied with epithets apparently intended to be enduring: 'Here come the $200 boys from Philadelphia,' and others of like import. The affair at Shepherdstown, though, wiped everything out. That was a crucial test, and one which conquered the prejudices of men whose trials in battle fitted them to judge of the worth of their fellows. Opprobrious allusions were changed to plaudits, and, for months afterwards, the command was pointed out everywhere to strangers as 'the men who fought at Shepherdstown.' "

The History pays many tributes to individual members of the regiment who showed special bravery under fire, fortitude in enduring severe wounds, and humanitarian acts. As they climbed the hill by the narrow path, one of them jumped from the ranks to rescue from their perilous position four quivering horses attached to a Confederate battery wagon, which had caught on some trees and brush overhanging a deep ravine.

For the History Sergeant H. T. Peck related with telling effect his experience as a prisoner of war, subsequent to his Shepherdstown capture.

"After the engagement of September 20th, the prisoners were detained several hours by the rebels in a little grove half a mile north of the battle-field and on a road leading from Shepherdstown. . . . Late in the day we were marched some five or six miles comformably with a movement of the rebel corps.

"Our men were subsisting on the food they had in haversacks at the time of battle, together with what corn 'pone' they could buy from the rebel soldiers. Some who were without money went a little short of food, but there was no suffering at all, the luckier ones dividing with the others quite liberally. In the morning, Monday, rations of wheat flour and bacon were issued to us. The latter was very acceptable and useful. The flour, though good in quality, was entirely useless to our men since they, unlike the Confederates, were without skill in cooking it and had no opportunity of trading it for bread or meat.

"Shortly after receiving rations we commenced our march to Winchester. Reaching Martinsburg at about ten o'clock, we passed first through the better part of the town. Few men were to be seen, but many of the women came to their doors or windows to see us pass and fling at us bitter exclamations. We were called Yankee devils, murderers and thieves, and our guard was begged to strangle or shoot us. It was the young ladies especially who fired at us this quality of animosity. At the other end of town, the locality of more humble homes, our reception was materially different. Women and children came to us from all directions with a profusion of lunches of bread and meat and cakes, and in many instances with jars of preserves, their choicest dainties, which they really could ill afford to part with. The guards offered no objections to these contributions, and indeed congratulated us on our good luck.

"These women belonged to the families employed mostly in the extensive railroad shops located there, and were presumably from the North.

"While halted for rest near the town of Bunker Hill, a rebel band, out of sight, but nearby in the woods, gave us a surprise, probably more pleasant than they imagined, by playing the Star Spangled Banner.

"In Winchester we were consigned to the courthouse and the inclosure between it and the street. . . .

"Every afternoon while we were here a neatly-dressed mulatto girl came to the court-house yard with a large loaf of bread, a lump of butter and a kettle of two or three gallons of delicious soup. She invariably delivered the gift to one of our sergeants, . . . She could not be induced to tell the sergeant who sent the food, saying: 'I darsent tell her name for fear of these (Confederate) soldiers, but my missis sends it.' . . .

"One morning a young lady we had frequently noticed as the recipient of many attentions from Confederate officers came to the railing and, calling to one of our party, said: 'Sergeant, you are to be paroled in a few days (this was our earliest report about it) and sent home. I wish, if you see General Shields when you return, you would give him Belle Boyd's compliments, and say she would be happy to see him in the valley again.' . . .

On the morning of September 29 the prisoners were brought into the court-house, one by one, to sign a parole paper. To the last one who signed, the Confederate captain remarked: "Why, I find all your men can write their own names."

"We marched out of Winchester at 9 or 10 in the morning, and soon reached the hills to the eastward; thence all the way to Harper's Ferry we passed through a country very beautiful in a dress of early autumn foliage. We were pushed on at a rapid gait, as our guard was at this time a detachment of mounted men, but, having no load to carry, we were not inordinately fatigued. We bivouacked beside a mountain stream and resumed the march early in the morning, passing through Charlestown, of John Brown fame. We came to our outposts, a short distance from Harper's Ferry, late in the afternoon. A flag of truce was sent in and we were promptly transferred to the Federal commandant of pickets."
